As of this week, Eurosurveillance has a new website. The radical change in the lay-out of the journal follows the merging of the two previous electronic editions in January 2008. We are now presenting Eurosurveillance in a modern, fresh and user-friendly layout. The design reflects that the journal has become one coherent edition, with short and long articles alike presented according to their categories.

A full archive of all articles dating back to our first issue in 1995 is available to browse and search and text and images are now easier to read: you just click on the thumbnails for larger versions of graphs and figures. Furthermore, you will find a ‘Printer friendly version’ in the top right of the screen. In the near future, we plan to provide a PDF on publication and to add more content to the site, including news about upcoming events, press releases and other information.

Eurosurveillance currently has an average of over 50 new subscribers a week, and we are keen to take the journal into a new era, serving all those working towards preventing and controlling infectious diseases in Europe and beyond. If you have any comments about the new website’s design or functions, please do not hesitate to email us at eurosurveillance@ecdc.europa.eu.
